GENERAL INFORMATION

Explorers in the early 1800s visited the region, with trappers in the north of Utah and fortune seekers and Franciscan Monks in southern Utah. These explorers are immortalized in statues on top of the city building on State Street and 400 South, which is also the site of the first encampment of the Mormon pioneers.

Members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, referred to as "Mormons" because of the Book of Mormon, which is another testament of Christ, were persecuted and driven from the eastern states. They found refuge in Utah, an area unwanted by others. In 1847 Brigham Young led members of the church to the Salt Lake valley, where they established the church headquarters. Now approximately 35% of Salt Lake City's population is Mormon.

The state bird is the California Seagull and the state tree is the Quaking Aspen. The University of Utah Medical Center, Primary Children's Hospital, and Huntsman Cancer Center bring patients from other states.

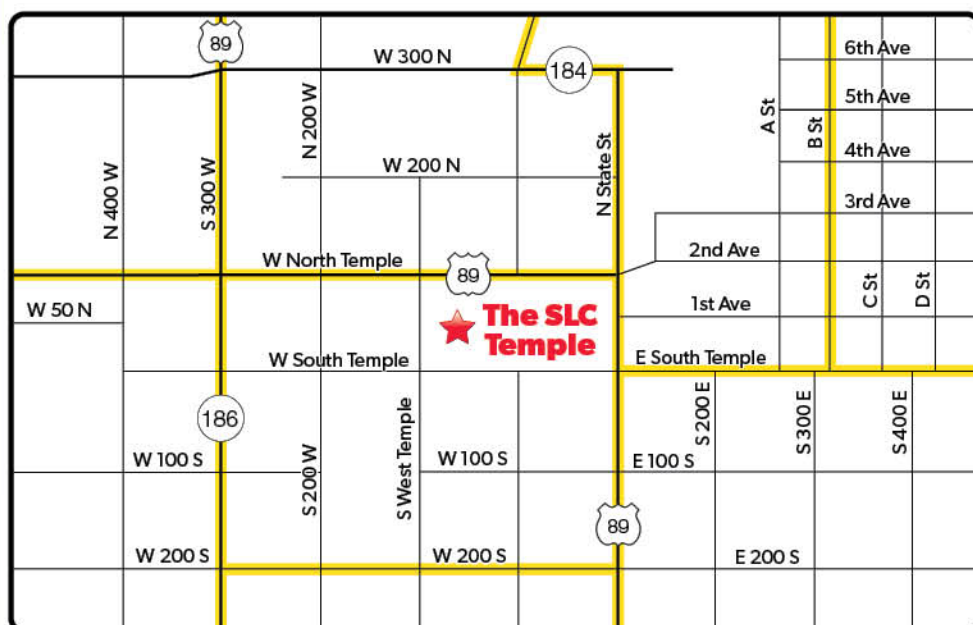

Mining has played a prominent role in the state's history and is still an important factor in its economy. The Kennecott Copper Mine is the largest open pit mine in the country - daily tours are available.

The Great Salt Lake can be seen by driving 15 miles due west, which takes you to the south shore. You may also drive north and then west across the causeway to Antelope Island.
